

Other Government Support

Employment Standards legislation does not cover all issues in the workplace. Employers and employees often ask questions better answered by another government agency or department.

Who do employers and employees contact with concerns about safety in the workplace?

Workplace Safety and Health is responsible for protecting the health and safety of workers on the job.

Workplace Safety and Health focuses on preventing workplace and public hazards through education, training, working with employers and employees, and inspections and investigations.

Who do employers or employees contact with questions about discrimination or human rights?

The Manitoba Human Rights Commission protects people in Manitoba from discrimination in various areas, including the workplace. The Human Rights Code has regulations that prevent people from being discriminated against on the basis of certain characteristics, including family status, source of income, sexual orientation, race, gender, age, disability, or religion.

Who do employers or employees contact about collective bargaining, unfair labour practices or lack of union representation?

The Manitoba Labour Board settles labour relations disputes between employers, employees and unions, helping them communicate and work toward agreement. The board is also the final level of appeal for decisions made by Employment Standards. The board tries to mediate disputes, but also has a formal process similar to a court, where it hears arguments from the employers, employees, or unions. Generally, the board's decision is the final level of appeal.
